

AND THE WINNER IS...

Sandy wondered if anyone in the office would ask what she'd done that weekend.

Sandy heaved a sigh of relief - she'd made the airport in time. It had certainly been a rush. She was pleased that she would now have time to look over her notes for the presentation one more time before the flight. Being a member of the Koru Club made this easy with the quiet environment and office resources. Yet again, she was grateful that the organisation paid for her membership. 'Lately, I seem to be spending more time working in Koru Lounges than I do in the office', she thought wryly.

After handing in her luggage and ticket, Sandy dropped her business card into the monthly draw jar. She could win a bottle of wine when the draw is made. Maybe her card will win the six-monthly prize of the weekend trip for two to Sydney. She wondered if she should mention it at work or not if she won.

Sandy checked her watch - her partner Steve was due at the airport in a few minutes. He was on the same flight. Steve, not being a member of the Koru Club, had asked Sandy if she could give him one of her 'visitor' cards so that he could meet her in there. Sandy's employer, in paying for her membership of the club had also paid for the limited number of 'visitor' cards available to members.